The scene at the American Capitol on Wednesday was one of violence, looting, armed insurrection and treason; several dozen people have been arrested; several dead including a police officer; congress now weighing removal of Trump; the president's twitter account suspended. Trump has finally done it: he has for multiple months whipped his supporters up into a frenzy and now they've invaded the center of American power. This happened while Congress was attempting to certify the 2020 election for Biden, and then had to recess due to the insurrection. However, they later return and successfully certified the vote.

Black Lives Matter and antifa smashed windows, Trump supporters stormed the capitol. In any other era, those who attempted a coup of this magnitude would've been shot on sight. The DC police should've opened fire and asserted their authority. You cannot attempt to overthrow the government and expect anything less. The American image around the world has been permanently tarnished, in that our own government couldn't keep its Capitol protected. Americans talk a big game about freedom, but in the end we all like our own form of authoritarianism. That's not even a criticism or unique to us, so much as it is a part of human nature. We want a strongman to stamp our image of the world on society.

> Not saying that this was some kind of genuine neo-revolutionary moment, but imagine the absurd spectacle of the Third Estate's leaders pouring cold water on efforts to storm the Bastille, or Samuel Adams insisting Bostonians "respect the redcoats, unhand the tea". "We are the Party of Law & Order; that will STILL be the case even after the police open fire on us. BLUE LIVES MATTER!1!!"

Trump attempting to pour water on the fire of his own coup is astounding. It shows the level of narcissism and egomania of this man, who only cares about his own image. The second his supporters actually acted on his words, his disses them to save his twitter account. This man doesn't just need to be impeached and removed. Trump needs to be prosecuted and thrown in jail forever.
